Financial regulators expect financial institutions to have a process in place (staffed by skilled individuals) that serves as an “early warning” system to adequately identify deteriorating credit risk in loans. The annual credit review of commercial borrowers is the critical element of this process.

Obtaining and analyzing current financial statements is an important part of this process, along with guarantor analysis, site visits, market and industry review, collateral coverage determination, and the appropriateness of loan structuring. This presentation will focus on regulatory expectations and provide insight on documenting the adequacy of the annual credit review process.

Continuing Education: Attendance verification for CE credits provided upon request.
